H. Payne, Fresident of the Wesleyan University of Delaware, O., 1sat evening. There was a sirge and appreciative audience present, and the closest attention was given the speaker from the beginning to the end of the discourse. Among these in attended the discourse. Among these in attended the discourse and the peaker from the beginning to the end of the discourse. Among these in attended the discourse and the situation of the discourse and the situation of the discourse. Among these in attended the artist, and not her moral charge of young folks around the fact that the speaker from the beginning to the end of the discourse and the situation of the nd class have eyes that are to barp and are constantly seeing things in the second class have eyes that are too therp and are constantly seeing things in an exeggerated light.

There is a social sham personified and obstantived in the masculine gender, dressed in fine clothes, and labelled "genderan." He draws much admiration from soft hearts and softer heads; is innocent of knowledge and moral worth; is a patent-leather puppet who cuts a swelling durie in society, because his father has money. We might justly draw a similar picture of a young lady. A large proportion of our social customs are shams, and they seem most buildensome to our saters of the gentler sex. An average young woman expends enough labor, foresight and abrewdness in the matter of dress, for a sake cashier or theological neophyte. Lock at our fashionable your gwomen. They are all furbelowed, frilled, ribboned and curied. But it is not in dress alone that there are shams, and I feel sure there are no specimens here, for they wouldn't come out on such a night as this.

Society will hardly thank us for unmasking its shams. It has been my privilege to explore the scenes of many shades of life. I have gone through New York by night, from the Five Points to Fifth Avenue. In London I have visited the low dens and the brilliant palaces, the Seven Dials and St. Giles'. I have seen Paris by moonlight and gaslight and quality; and have been in imperial Rame, ancient Cairo and Jerusalem. In all of these I have seen myrisds of illustrations of the delusions to which mankind are given; but I propose to speak of the shams that stak abroad in our own society. We en; but I propose to speak of the shame t stalk abroad in our own society. We that stalk abroad in our own society. We find them everywhere, sometimes even among the congregation of the saints.

How many of ourselves do we find going to parties at an hour when honest people ought to be in bed; and then it was nothing but a dress parade. Simplicity is the true nobility. Even at home man fluds domestic shams, but forbears saying anything for the sake of peace. Addison, in the Speciator, said of a man who was wont to dress and eat with smplicity and common sense, that his friends shut him up in an insane asylum.

mon sense, that his littless stat may be in an insane asylum.

Of business shams I will not say much in this honest town, for I believe that here everybody pays his honest debts. But in New York, Cincinnati, and Chicago, I know of financial bubbles which frequently burst.

In educational matters there are many the fault I think with us is no.

tion is true manhood. I am glad to see the best and most thorough institutions in the land have now more students than eyer.

The speaker referred at some length to shams among the learned professions, political shams, and sham reforms addining at strong and sensible observations and brilliant illustrations under each of these beads. In political affairs he thought it a question of great importance whether or not universal, unqualified suffrage should continue in this country. The attention of the young who were seeking truth was directed to Nature and the Bibls.

The great question in the scientific sworld is, "Is man in need of a creator?" He mentioned the fact that releutists, such as Huxley, Tyndall and Darwin were constantly changing their opinions and be town. The Reverend's descriptions and impressions of scenes he had visited and must dupon in the Holy Land were very read and effective.
